WAKEFIELD HIGH SCHOOL

Wakefield High School is located at South Chesterfield Road and South Dinwiddie Street, Arlington County, Virginia. The School designed for 2000 students, opened in September, 1953. The first class graduated at the end of the 1955-56 school year. It presently houses junior and senior high school students; in the future it will be a Senior High School only.

The building designed by The Rhees Burkett Architectural Firm contains 45 academic classrooms, 8 science rooms, 7 business education rooms, 4 home making rooms, and 3 art rooms; separate facilities are provided for boys' and girls' physical education facilities. In addition a library, auditorium, clinic, cafeteria, administrative offices, students' store, bank and activity rooms are included.

The 40 acre site contains an athletic field, boys' playfield, and a girls' playfield. The athletic field and a large wooded area separates the play fields. An interior lawn court offers opportunity for outdoor activities for the library and home making programs.

Construction cost of the building, excluding site work, was $3,795,000. Total cost of the project, including land, architectural and engineering fees, consultants, equipment, legal fees, site work, etc., was $4,684,000. The building includes 4,028,000 cubic feet.

THE COMMUNITY

Arlington is a twenty-eight square mile residential community of 161,000 people located in Virginia, just across the Potomac River from Washington, D. C. Many Arlington residents are Federal Government officials and workers, or are members of the Armed Forces. It has one of the highest educational attainment levels in the nation (1950 census data) and an average annual income of approximately $10,000.00 per family. The citizens of Arlington are intensely interested in education and support their educational system with such distinction as to gain national recognition (e.g., March of Time film "The Fight for Better Schools"; The Saturday Evening Post article, September 21, 1957, p. 39 "Are the Public Schools Doing their Job" Brown, Herbert).

The community operating budget for 1956-1957 was $9,628,834.00 for 22,500 students. During the last decade the citizens have voted for school construction School Bonds amounting to over 24 million dollars.
